STUDIO TATE PRINCIPAL interior designer Alex Hopkins created this penthouse apartment in Melbourne to evoke 'LA glamour', a sophisticated concept using form and feature materials to reveal understated luxury with a classic Hollywood vibe.

What was the brief for this project? The owners were empty nesters who had lived here for several years. They wanted a refreshed, opulent look and an improved layout that could cater for entertaining kids and grandkids. What were the challenges of the project? We had to create a larger area to cater for the growing extended family and so we reconfigured the zone between the dining room and main bedroom to give extra amenity and storage. A custom table now seats 10 in the dining area. We transformed a second bedroom into a study/den area, and also looked to maximise the exceptional views of the Botanic Gardens. We considered how both of our clients used the space, and made changes to ensure they could really get the most out of their living space. How would you describe the completed interior? Opulent with a timeless aesthetic. Picking up on the owners' love of black and white, we made this a central theme, such as the chevron marble tile with black stone border in the main ensuite. Custom finishes are everywhere, such as the panelling in the kitchen and living areas and the distinctive lighting. Each element was an exercise in details. We think of it like the clasp on a luxury handbag – a subtle note that speaks volumes. What are some of your favourite design elements? To maximise the seating capacity in the dining area we designed a custom table in American oak inlaid with pink-veined green marble with a brass trim and 'socks' on the table legs. The dining chairs are in a blue and white Raf Simons upholstery, and an abstract artwork in bright pinks adorns the wall, the perfect counterpoint to a delicate pink and brass pendant light hanging above the table. Were the owners happy with the finished project? How do they use the space? The owners are delighted with the penthouse which is their city home during the working week. They use the home to entertain friends and family, have their grandchildren stay over, or enjoy quiet time together. They love the story that evolved as we developed key details to reference the LA glamour theme: green stone, brass and a considered selection of soft and bold colours – pink, deep green and bright blue – set against a black and white backdrop. We have injected a sense of individuality that reflects the personalities of the clients. studiotate.com.au
