Studio Tate will be hosting a webinar to discuss how COVID-19 has impacted workplace design on Wednesday 19 August 2020.

Titled The Future of Workplace Design – Challenges and Opportunities, it will be held at 1pm AEST and will be moderated by Australian Design Review editor Steve Scarlin.

Panelists will be discussing changes they anticipate to workplace design and furniture specifications, as well as looking at how COVID-19 has impacted the Central Business District and workplace culture, while assessing the need for third spaces to keep employees separate.

Drawing from their industry experience, the speakers will also be sharing their advice on how businesses of all industries and sizes can develop new ways to build culture, ensure connectivity and foster innovation.

The panel will be hosted by Studio Tate's Alex Hopkins.

Studio Tate design director Alex Hopkins will be hosting the panel.

As design director at the Melbourne studio, Hopkins excels in developing creative solutions across the studio, whether on the business or design side with extensive experience across workplace, residential and hospitality industries.

Alex Hopkins will be CEO Consulting Lucy Spryngier, who specialises in commercial workplace transformation projects of varying scales, acting on behalf of the board.

Lucy Spryngier, Matthew Savoio and Stephen Stewart will also be on the panel.

Hewlett's Matthew Savoio will also be speaking on the panel. Savoio facilitates strategic client workshops for the office furniture manufacturer with business leads and users in a human-centred co-creation approach to workplace design.

The panel will also feature Stephen Stewart, Project director at Vicinity. Stewart manages a variety of projects including a strategy for evolving facilities and non-traditional workspaces across the real estate investment fund company's portfolio in Australia.

At the end of the webinar, audience members will be invited to ask questions.
